Lights of New York
by L. L. STEVENSON

Just before he started on the expedition that he hopes will take his wife and himself into Amazon country, William LaVarre visited the American Museum of Natural History. There, for a few moments, he held in his hand the great Jonkhero uncut diamond which, as you may know, weighs 750 carats. Diamonds are no strangers to Mr. LaVarre. He has found many and bought more in South America. The largest stone ever handled by him, however, weighed 30 carats before it was cut. So he wanted the thrill of having the world's greatest uncut stone in his hands. Perhaps there was a touch of superstition about it also since, along with explorations, he will search for the precious white stones. But there was more than that.

Diamonds have a peculiar effect on those who hunt them, said Mr. LaVarre, as board the Van Rensselaer just before it started on its long voyage to Paramaribo, which will be the LaVarre headquarters. Those who find precious metals look on them simply as money. But a diamond apparently takes on a personality—or at least such a strong attraction that the finder hates to part with it. As proof, he told of two negroes who, having sold him their diamonds, came back day after day just to touch them again. When the diamonds finally were shipped to Amsterdam, their former owners were heart-broken. Miserably poor bush negroes often refuse all offers for diamonds, weighing 10 carats and up, simply because they cannot part with them. "It gets everybody," said Mr. LaVarre—and hence the visit to the museum.

To the people of the bush, Mr. LaTarre will call of having handled the greatest diamond in the world. He will explain its size and weight and how it felt to hold it in his hand. Those who listen will be largely "pork knockers," who will be in his employ. "Pork knockers" are former augur and file clarinetist hands thrown out of employment by the depression. They trade in bands of from six to ten and do diamond hunting. Having no financial backing, they are unable to purchase supplies. So they live largely on the wild pigs—peccaries—of the region, which they kill with clubs. Thus, why they were called "pork knockers" becomes apparent.

Lucius Beebe, probably the most urbane of various columnists heresbouts, spent three successive week-ends in the country. On the first, a bee stung him. That was painful, but on his next trip he had a worse experience—he was so severely sunburned he had to go into retirement for two days. He made one more try, however, and came back with a severe attack of poison ivy. So now he is determined to get the nearer the country than a roof garden.

Demonstration Forest Project Started Here

Money Appropriated To Buy Up Unprofitable Area

(Special to Times Virginian)

Plans for the purchase of 30,000 acres of land for a demonstration forest in Appomattox and Buckingham counties, were announced this week by James M. Gray, of Raleigh, N. C., regional director of Land Utilization, Resettlement Administration.

Mr. Gray revealed that an allocation of $229,000 had been approved for purchase of the land necessary for the project. Options are now being accepted on approved acreage. All land being acquired has been voluntarily offered for sale to the gv the owners, who will be paid when the titles have been approved.

James P. Andrews, of Farmville, is manager of the project.

The Appomattox — Buckingham project is located in what is known as the "problem area" of Central Piedmont Virginia. The project area spreads over forty six square miles of land once covered with magnificent virgin forests of hardwoods and shortleaf pine. The timber industry originally provided the inhabitants of the area with part time employment to supplement their farm incomes, but when the timber was exhausted and the cut over area has been swept by recurring forest fires, the farmers soon were out and in large measure abandoned their agricultural areas.

Now the Resettlement Administration is taking over this non productive area to convert it into a public forest and recreation center, thus restoring it from a liability to the counties in which it is located to a national asset.

Plans for the project call for new roads, camp grounds, fish propagation facilities, game sanctuaries, feed and cover crops, artificial lakes and a fire protection system. The project has been declared capable if self liquidation in a reasonable number of years.

When developed and put under management the area can serve to demonstrate the value of conservation of natural resources and of profound forest management for the education of people living within its reach," Mr. Gray stated.

At the same time, 125 of the 150 families now living in the impoverished region are to be resettled and will afforded a new start on more fertile farms in neighboring territory. Other families will relocate without help.

Park Association Will Have Meeting Monday

With trouble reported in efforts to make suitable terms with the present owners of the area wanted for inclusion in the National Park at the Appomattox Surrender Grounds, an important meeting will be held here Monday to plot future action.

This meeting is to be attended by Wilbur C. Hall, chairman of the state commission on conservation and development; by Floyd B. Flickinger, of the national park service, and by local and Lynchburg directors of the Appomattox Park Association.

It was not intended for any part of the $100,000 park authorization made possible by the recent congress to be used for the purchase of land. Plans were for the area to be acquired as submarginal land, and then transferred to the park department.

Suitable terms were reached with some of the owners, but other wanted areas were held to be more valuable than the price limit of the submarginal limit.

The three possible methods of obtaining the land are by purchase, donation and by condemnation.

Garden Club Winners Are Announced

Prizes in the garden contest of the Appomattox Garden Club were announced today by the committee of judges.

The contest was started last spring, when the Times Virginian offered a prize of $5.00 cash to the owner of the most attractive premises in town. Other prizes were then added, ... and the contest was on.

The following judges from the Lynchburg Garden Club made three inspections of local gardens before making the awards: Josephine Percy Kinier, Minnie E. Knight, and Ella H. Anderson.

Inspections were made in the spring, summer and fall. Each site was numbered, and the judges did not know the names of the owners.

The winners are as follows:

1. For best improvement in the general appearance of premises: Mrs F. C. Dresser.

2. For best kept premises: Mrs. A. R. Harwood.

For best kept lawn: Miss Lucy Smith.

For best general garden: Mrs. Chas. F. James.

For best garden of perennials: C. W. Smith.
